SPEECH OF BOURNE

Senator's "Popular Government" Address Creates Interest in Both Houses.

That there is widespread demand for information about the primary, the initlative and referendum, the recall, and corrupt practices legislation all over the corrupt practices legislation all over the country, is indicated by the calls for the recent speech on "Popular Government," by Senator Bourne of Oregon.

Few speeches made in either house of Congress lately have attracted more notice the country over than this one. About 300,000 copies of it have been printed. Demands for it are made in numbers ranging all the way from one to 37,000. Senator Owen asked for 37,000 copies of the speech for distribution to his constituents in Oklahoma.

Representative Polidexter of Washington, asked for 20,000 copies for distribution in Washington, where he is running for the Senate and is showing many symptoms of winning out. Senator Clapp has made requisition for a large number for distribution in Minnesota. Senator Brown has secured a large number for use in Nebraska.

Senator Bourne's speech was not a flight of oratory, but was simply a detailed setting forth of the workings of the Oregon laws appertaining to the primary, the recall, the initiative and referendum, and corrupt practices. Senator Bourne took the position that the people of Oregon had arrived at something like a real solution of the problem of popular government. untry, is indicated by the calls for the

Synopsis of Chapters Already Published
A newspaper reporter named Hammond, out of a job, meets a man named Faraday. They pawn Hammond's mother's watch to buy food. Faraday shows his friend a letter from Dr. Spotswood, his old guardian in Culpepper, Miss., asking him to come back home. The old man says he is dying and wants to clear up Faraday's parentage. He tells him his father was found with his throat cut, and that since that time the house of the murder has been haunted by an apparition, and a green lamp on the study table has burned unceasingly.

With Faraday's negry servant, Zeb, the two friends, securing meney, go to Culpepper on Faraday's sloop, the Beau Gallant. Faraday loses the pawn ticket for his watch. The watch has a mysterious inscription on it, which the friends believe has something to do with the mystery of the lamp.

The two friends go to the haunted mansion. On their way they are passed by a frightened man driving a buggy at full speed. They see the emerald light and the form of an aged man, which suddenly disappears. Frightened, they return to the sloop. CHAPTER XV (Continued).

ANY a night have I seen on the Sound coast, but never a one that equaled this for pure, unearthly beauty. The riew from the lawn was superb. A storm was brewing, as I have mentioned, but for the present every-thing was quiet and sultry and sullen, as if inanimate nature was bracing itself to stand an insult without re-

There was still some moonlight, but very soft and wanly yellew—a fleeting glow, momentarily obscured by high-scudding shreds of cloud. Below there was little wind—just transient gusts that came now and again to roughen the surface of the waves and ripple the reflected lunar to radiance. Over in the west the storm cleuds were backing up, black and ominous—a deep bank, black as a pool of stagnant water seen at night—and little red streaks of lightning flitted incessantly through it, like a red hot needle sewing the clouds together. The Sound, too, grim and inky, showing the images of this running light—and, well, it was powerfully beautiful and impressive.

Never heard of anything so utit rily without rhyme or reason. Guess he wasn't so very anxious for me to come into my own, after all, from the way he acted.

"However, we've got his precious memorandum, and all we have to do now is to go to the library in the haunted house and fellow directions."

"If we do, I hope our fair purpose and intent will lay the ghostly visitant," said I fervently.

"Well, who's afraid? Wait a minute—let's have another look at his directions. I put them in a pigeon-hole in the desk here just after I came back.
"Here they are—— No, by George, I must be mistaken. Let me think. No. sir, I distinctly remember putting them into this desk."

Faraday breathed hard at the thought of the way in which we two had been tricked.

For myself, I was the more concerned with the results which Deal might accomplish with his new knowledge before we had the time to interfere. Upon this subject I spoke.
